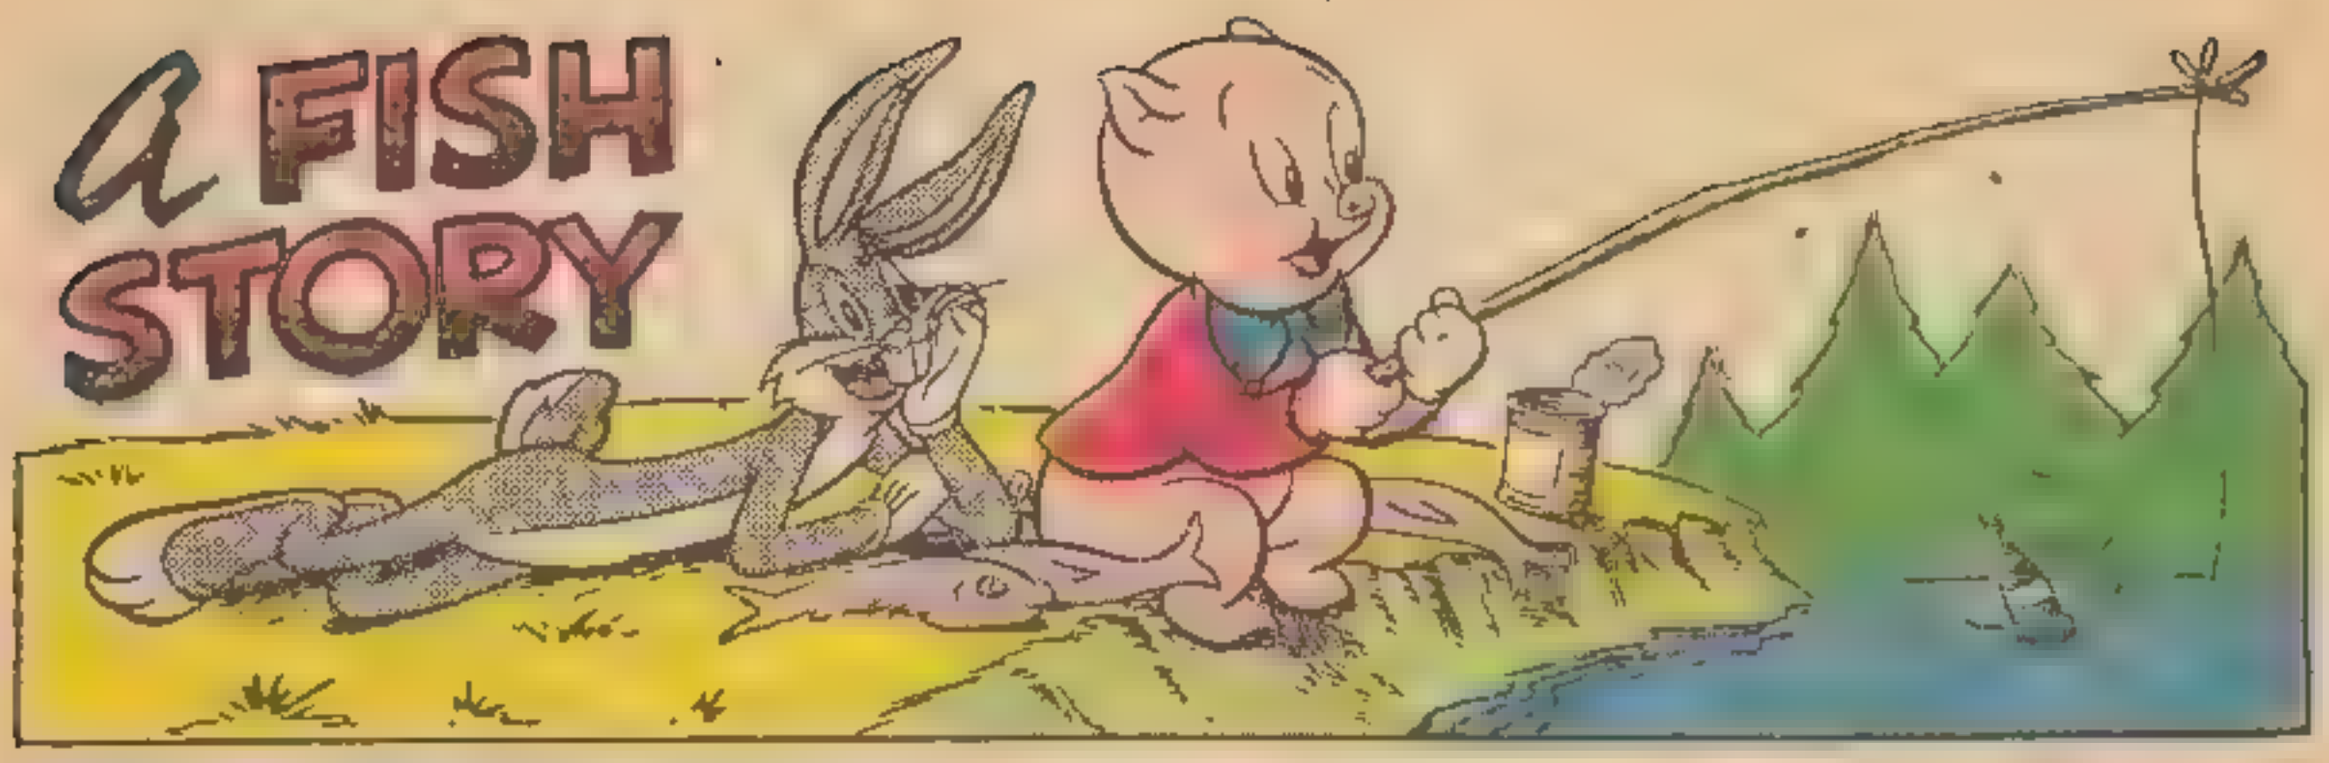
a FISH STORY



One beautiful morning, Bugs Bunny and Porky Pig breezed into Petunia's kitchen like a whirlwind.

"Petunia!" shouted Bugs excitedly. "Don't buy any meat for dinner tonight! We're gonna get you some nice fresh fish!"

"Where?" asked Petunia calmly. "At the market?"

Bugs looked hurt. "Don't be silly! We're gonna CATCH 'em!"

"Ha! Ha!" said Petunia. But she was not laughing. "Remember the last time you two went fishing? And how we ended up with canned beans that night?"

"But, P-Petunia," said Porky, "THIS t-time will be d-different!"

"Yeah," agreed Bugs. "Just wait an' see!"

The two confident fishermen dashed out of the house and down the walk to Porky's car parked at the curb.

"Drive on, McDuff!" cried Bugs, as he vaulted over the car door and landed on Porky, who was sliding in on the opposite side.

"Gee whiz, B-Bugs!" scowled Porky. "What are you t-trying to do?"

"Sorry, doc!" Bugs flopped back to his side of the seat and stretched out comfortably. "But this topless jalopy always brings out the bunny in me!"

Two hours later, Porky brought his car to a sudden stop at a parking space, a few feet from a mountain stream. "W-Well, here we are!" he said.

Bugs leaped out of the car as he had leaped in, grabbed his fishing rod, and headed for the stream. Porky brought up the rear, as usual.

"Now, for some fancy fishin'!" said Bugs, settling himself on the bank and casting out his line.

And fancy fishing it was, too. Why, those little trout fairly leaped at the bait. Bugs caught two and Porky got three in the first hour.

"Jeepers!" cried Bugs. "What a cinch! Let's catch some more an' sell 'em to Mister Cutter at the market!"

"Okay!" agreed Porky. "But f-first, let's eat our lunch. I'm s-starved!"

"Now THAT'S the kind of suggestion I like to hear you make!" Bugs smacked his lips. "Bring on the grub, bub!"

Porky trudged up to the car and got the lunch while Bugs patted down the grass to make a seat under a big shade tree. Bugs was a big help to Porky, all right!

As they lolled against the tree trunk munching sandwiches, Bugs noticed a bald eagle perched in a nearby tree, watching them.

"Hi, National Emblem!" he saluted. "How about givin' me your pitcher? — on the back of a millyon quarters, that is!"

The eagle must have thought Bugs was inviting him to lunch, for he swooped down and grabbed two of the five fish lying on the bank.

"Our f-fish!" screamed Porky, leaping to his feet.

"Hey, you!" yelled Bugs, hurling a rock while he gave chase. "Drop those trout!"

"Cac-cac-cac!" taunted the bold thief, winging his way back to his perch in the tree.

"The nerve of that bird!" muttered Bugs disgustedly. "A fine thing to have for the emblem of our country!"

Porky giggled. "Cheer up, B-Bugs! We can catch s-some more!"

But their second try was not so easy. It took them all the rest of the afternoon to catch just two more fish.

"Oh, well," Bugs said. "Two oughta bring us enough dough to buy some ice cream for dessert."

Porky nodded, while he dropped the slippery fish into the large paper bag that had contained their lunch. Then, piling into the car, they drove quickly back to town.

Arriving at the market during the last-minute rush before closing time, the boys had trouble getting attention. At last Bugs dumped the fish out on the meat block behind the counter.

"Wanna buy a couple of these beauties?" he asked Mister Cutter.

"Sure, Bugs!" said the butcher, eyeing the fish. "They look mighty good!" He took eighty cents out of the cash register and handed it to Bugs.

"Thanks!" grinned Bugs. "Take your choice. Then put the rest back in the bag. We'll pick 'em up after we get some ice cream."

When Porky and Bugs returned to the meat counter, Mister Cutter was busy grinding up meat. He told them the fish were wrapped and lying on the counter. Bugs grabbed the package, and they hurried out.

"I can hardly wait to see Petunia's face," chuckled Bugs, "when we walk in with these bee-U-tee-ful trout and three pints of ice cream."

"M-Me, too!" grinned Porky.

A few minutes later, Porky pulled up in front of Petunia's house. "Better unwrap the f-fish!" he suggested, "or P-Petunia will think we b-bought them!"

Bugs tore open the package. Then he and Porky gave a startled cry. Their trout had turned into spareribs!

"Oh, NO!" screamed Bugs. "I grabbed the wrong package! Quick! Drive back to the market!"

The boys were too late—the market was closed. Moaning and groaning with woe, they headed once more for Petunia's house.

"Poor P-Petunia!" wailed Porky. "She's g-going to be s-so disappointed!"

"An' mad, an' disgusted, an' sarcastic!" added Bugs. "Boy! Do I hate to face her with THIS fish story!"

But there was no way out, so, face her they did.

"Petunia!" mumbled Bugs. "I—er—I've got —something—er—to—ahem—tell ya!"

"Well, before you begin," answered Petunia cheerily, "put that package of spareribs in the refrigerator."

"Huh?" yelled Bugs, pop-eyed with astonishment.

"H-How—?" Porky began in surprise.

"Ha, ha, ha, ha!" And this time, Petunia WAS laughing. "You see," she went on, "Mister Cutter brought your fish HERE, when he couldn't find either of you at home. And he told me all about your mixup. He's coming back to pick up the spareribs. They belong to Mrs. Spiffledorfer."

So they dined on "bee-U-tee-ful" trout, after all. And the fish were so delicious that Bugs forgave Baldy Eagle for snitching two of them.

"That bird knows a good dinner when he sees it!" he chuckled. "Guess I won't mind having his pitcher on the next quarter I hope I get. Ha, ha!"
